The most advanced minds as well as the least advanced are obliged to use the same words. If we adopt new words, it will be even more difficult - if not impossible - to make ourselves understood. The new man must therefore express himself in conventional language.

In art the search for a content which is collectively understandable is false; the content will always be individual.

The natural color of materials must also disappear as far as possible under a layer of pure color or of noncolor (black, white, or gray).

Everything is expressed through relationships.

I believe that new art must differ totally in its manifestation from art as we know it, and people may be very reluctant to accept this.

Like play, art must continue
Just as pure abstract art is not dogmatic, neither is it decorative.
